Few march for day care

A small crowd of students assembled in front of the Arts Building yesterday afternoon in a rally organized by the Alliance for Child Care (ACC).

The group chanted "Day Care is a right, not a privilege", "Make McGill relevant to people's needs," and "Support day care at McGill for all those who need it". The crowd then marched to the Administration Building.

A moving picket line was maintained for about fifteen minutes and then the group attempted to enter the building. Before anyone could get inside, the front door was locked by security guards standing in the lobby. The demonstrators then continued picketing in front of the building.

Employees returning to the Administration Building after their lunch hours could not get in by the front door and had to present identification cards at the side entrance to gain admittance. One employee who had forgotten his card was refused entrance.

In response to a request for an interview with the person responsible for locking the door, a Daily reporter was told to get lost by a well-dressed administration functionary. When asked to identify himself, he said only, "I don't think that's any of your business."

The security guard checking employee identity cards at the side entrance of the administration building said that extra guards had been brought in specifically for the rally at the request of the administration.

Later on in the afternoon, a spokeswoman for the ACC announced that negotiations would take place at 5 pm between the ACC and Principal Bell and Vice-Principal Frost. Upon reaching a satisfactory arrangement with the McGill Administration the ACC will discuss common action with other community action groups to put pressure on the Quebec government for the right of day care.

When contacted after meeting with Bell and Frost, the ACC would say only "We are in negotiation with the University. We are very hopeful."

MPCC members acquitted

Seven members of the Milton-Park Citizens' Committee (MPCC) were acquitted yesterday of the charges of private mischief.

The trial, which arose out of the May 26 occupation of the offices of Concordia Estates Limited was marked by extensive discussions of the wider issues involved and not simply the legal aspects. Much of the defense's testimony concerned the profit oriented nature of Concordia, the bad faith in which they had acted throughout their contact with the Milton Park Citizens' Committee, the housing problem in Montreal, and the rights of citizens to determine what happens to their community. In addition the defense attempted to prove that the occupiers had just cause to be at the Concordia offices since they were there to obtain and relay information and that they had not impaired the normal business affairs of Concordia.

On Tuesday the defense called Philip Coleman, a founder and ex-president of Concordia from 1959 to 1967. Most of his testimony concerned Cité Concordia, the project Concordia is planning to build on the land which they have cleared by the demolition of homes and other buildings in the area. He testified that:

- Concordia as early as 1968 had difficulty obtaining money to purchase the houses in the area
- Cité Concordia, in his opinion, was not economically viable

- the housing in the project would in no way be available to the average working man (for economic reasons).

Finally, when asked for what purposes Concordia undertook the project, Coleman replied in one word — "profit".

McGill English professor David Williams described the difficulties of negotiations between MPCC and Concordia and their eventual breakdown due to Concordia's refusal to meet with MPCC. He also said that John Lynch-Staunton, vice-president of the

STUDENTS' COUNCIL

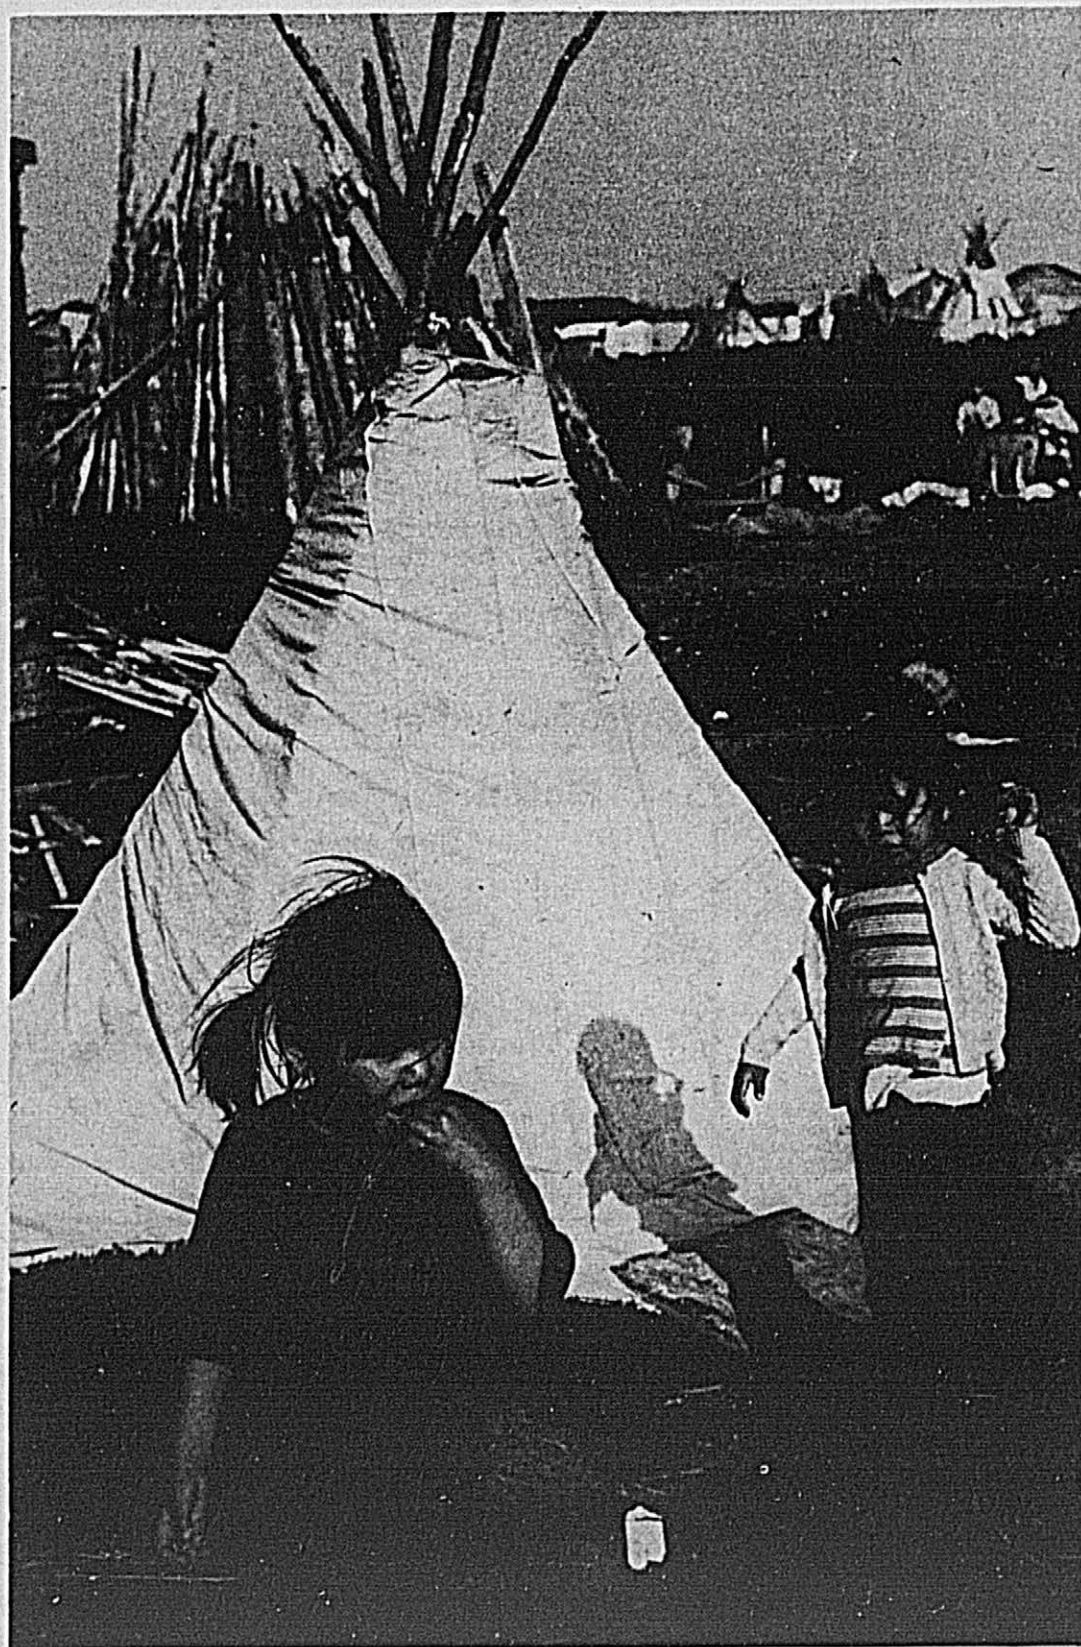

Students' Council last night approved motions supporting:

- The Alliance for Child Care in its struggle to establish a day care centre on campus. Five hundred dollars were allocated to help defray operating expenses.

- Université du Québec and Université de Montréal students in their struggle with their administrations over fees.

HILLEL

The executive of the McGill Hillel Students' Society voted yesterday to support the actions of the Alliance for Child Care in its struggle to make day care a right and not a privilege.

Sherlock and the McConnell Caper

"I'm absolutely dumbfounded. How did you find out who did it?"

"It all began a couple of weeks ago when, in the dead of night, a few people now known as the 'Montreal 9' slunk into the game room of McConnell Hall brandishing a can of red paint, brush, and hammer-and-sickle stencil. To understand the full significance of the preceding activity, one must return to the scene of a certain clandestine meeting held in a McConnell Hall cell, or a dorm room, as I believe the Canadians call it."

"Hey, did youse guys see dat cutie Canuck flag painted six feet high all ovuh the wall?"

"Yeh," said everyone.

"Who's fuh stickin' our symbol up their wall?"

"Me," said everyone.

"Let's wiggle our asses down ta Simpson's and get the stuff."

The gang made their way to the department store where the following conversation ensued:

The gang: 'What kind of paint would be nice for vandalism?'

Paint Salesman: 'This red is nice.'

Gang: 'Which is harder to get off the wall, latex or acrylic?'

"That night, back at McConnell, the Montreal 9 plotted their deed, carried it out and washed their hands of the matter with turpentine. Yes, Watson, but they were not clever enough, for I uncovered the rags in an old trash bin beneath John Southin's balcony."

"I say Holmes, how did you discover the dastards?"

"Elementary, my dear Watson. By the water mark on their bonded typewriter as well as the sort of type face they used."

"Paper? Typewriter? They typed the... I thought they painted the hammer-and-sickle on the post."

"Quite. When the residence director spied the dread red peril on the pillar, he barked, 'Take that dread red peril off the pillar.' His compliant vigilante committee complied. In place of the symbol, they left a rather crude and unoriginal postulation as to the diet of the villains. (Eat shit.)

"The next morning: 'Hey man. Get a load of the cover up job downstairs.'

'Wow,' exclaimed everyone.

"We did a darn good job. Who in the blazes do they think they are? This calls for some big-time action."

"In the middle of the night they returned to the scene of the crime in order to retaliate for the vandalism perpetrated upon their creation. Behind them a trail of paint led away from the expansive red blob which they had painted where the Canadian flag had once stood. A clue to the gang's identity was left in black: the surname, 'Meursault' adorned their mis-chiefpiece.

"In the coming days, several letters admonishing Meursault appeared beneath the locked glass cupboard on the ground floor of McConnell Hall. An apology typed by Meursault also appeared there mysteriously. It was this document that I scrutinized and that led to the discovery of Meursault!"

"A brilliant piece of work, my fellow!"

"Yes. You see Meursault had apologized for his retaliatory act, but was not willing to make himself (themselves) known, fearing reprisal by 'the forces of good' in the hall.

"Although the identity of Meursault was known to me alone, one resident, singled out by Scotland yard detectives, was interrogated for two hours at the crack of morn. Sidestepping the hall's student-membered judicial committee, the Yard conducted a secret investigation. According to Deputy-Chief Smith, a grapevine comprising 160 of the hall's residents was certain of Meursault's identity. They had accused the lad being questioned of being Meursault. Scotland Yard begged him to give himself and his fellow gang members up.

"I knew that 160 people could not have witnessed the act of the flag desecration. Disguised as the fifth floor maid, I made my way through the hall picking up assorted bits of conversation and piecing them together.

"It was necessary for the Chief to act quickly and to find the real culprits before the Royal Society of the Visiting McConnell Family saw their blushing cinder-block. But he was unable to solve the mystery and to this day only I know the answer."

UQAM students to negotiate

A four-hour meeting last night at Université du Québec à Montréal, attended by 1,400 students, ended in complete solidarity between full and part-time students. The UQAM strikers also voted overwhelmingly to continue their strike and to initiate direct negotiations with the provincial government.

The rally — the largest since the strike at UQAM began last week in opposition to the university's plans to expel 3,000 students for late fee payments — had originally been called by an ad hoc committee of students from the Administration Module of the university. The meeting, which was supposed to discuss the alleged "unrepresentativeness" of the Comité d'Organisation Provisoire des Etudiants (COPE), had been financed by the university administration and had been intended for part-time students only.

The ad hoc committee proved incapable, however, of running the meeting, and COPE had to take charge.

The members of the ad hoc committee were called to answer questions from the general assembly. The students in the audience demanded to know who had financed the ad hoc committee, why the committee called only evening students to meet, and who had given them a mandate to call such a meeting.

The assembly rejected a proposal calling for a mediator to settle the controversy, and denounced the committee's attempt to split student ranks.

COPE then gave a half-hour summary of the strike situation. They said that the UQAM administration's recent actions are part of a province-wide educational policy of conducting severe cutbacks in the number of university students. The new financial barriers would be especially burdensome for working-class children. All this comes at a time when the administration is unveiling plans for a $55 million expansion program.

COPE proposed that the strike be continued and that a five-man negotiating team be set up to deal directly with Education Minister Cloutier rather than the administration.

The proposal carried with 1,300 for and 10 against.

Twenty minutes of cheering and chanting followed the overwhelming vote for solidarity.

Money to pay for the facilities used during the meeting was then collected, as the students insisted that the administration not have a hand in the operations, and UQAM students signed up to work on the picket lines.

Executive Committee of Montreal City Council, had assured MPCC that there would be no demolition until Concordia could prove that they were ready, and had the funds, to begin construction (something which they have been unable to do). He further testified that he himself had not heard the order to disperse and that it was difficult to hear due to the noise caused by construction in the area. In addition, he substantiated the earlier testimony of Ed Smith, Executive Director of the University Settlement, that a member of MPCC was not allowed to leave the area after the order to disperse was read, and was subsequently arrested.

Yesterday the court heard the summations of both the prosecution and the defense, as well as the judge's charging of the jury, before the not guilty verdict was returned. Michel Leclair, the defense attorney, began his comments by asking the jurors to consider which party in the conflict had brought more harm to the society — the citizens who struggled to preserve their community, or the corporation who destroyed the community in order to build high rises and make profit.

He then stated that the prosecution had not proved beyond reasonable doubt that any of the accusations were true and that, in fact, the prosecution witnesses had contradicted themselves in several instances. He also stressed that the citizens had just cause to be at the offices since their purpose was to meet with Mr. Nerenberg, president of Concordia. He went on to say that the offices were specifically used for tenants' business and complaints.

Citizens, he continued, had an obligation to protect themselves. Recent actions, such as the Cabano struggle had demonstrated that, given frustration by due process, the only effective means to achieve their needs was direct action on their own behalves.

He countered the prosecution's attempts to discredit Claire Culhane's motives through its allegations that she was a "professional agitator". He said that her participation in the cause of the Vietnamese people by working in a hospital in Vietnam, by writing a book, condemning Canada's involvement in Vietnam, and by demonstrating arose from her humanist convictions. In the case of the actions of the MPCC, she participated because of these convictions and the fact that she had been hired as a community organizer to help the people of the community articu-

Similarly the other defendants had earlier stated the motives which resulted in their own participation. These motives were basically to preserve their community in the face of its destruction.

The jury returned the verdict after an hour and a half of deliberation. It is likely that as a result of this verdict the charges against the remaining 19 individuals arrested at the same time will be dropped.
